Sustainable Development Goals

Peace, Justice and Strong Institutions

Encouraging the establishment of peaceful communities where no one is marginalized is essential for achieving sustainable development. This involves ensuring that everyone has access to justice, building effective and accountable institutions that are inclusive at all levels, and significantly reducing illicit flows of money and weapons. Additionally, it includes enhancing the recovery and return of stolen assets and combating all forms of organized crime..

On the sidelines of the American University in Cairo Forum in the Arab Republic of Egypt—officially sponsored by Alnoor University and the International Academy for Leadership and Development—Assistant Lecturer Saad Saleh Dhiab, a faculty member at Alnoor University, participated in a scientific dialogue session titled: "The Role of Science and Regional Health Measures for Sustainable Peace." During the session, Mr. Saad spoke about local methods used to promote social peace in Iraq, with a focus on the scientific and community contributions of Alnoor University in Nineveh Governorate. He also addressed the current state of climate action in the region, highlighting the importance of leveraging various sciences to enhance integration and coexistence among societal components. This session was part of the second edition of the American University in Cairo Forum, which brought together participants and researchers from several Arab countries to shed light on developmental and scientific issues in the region.
